

Creative BC Self-Identification Form

Initial launch date: April 1, 2022

Most recent revisions: April 28, 2022

Creative BC invites all applicants, clients, employees, board members and contractors to self-identify. Our purpose in collecting this information relates to improving equity, diversity and inclusion within our staff, our workforce, and more broadly, within the creative sector we serve. Visit our website to read background and privacy.

To support the application submission, individuals are required to complete the following self-identification form. The language in this self-identification form is set based on consultation, research, and alignment with key statistical frameworks with which we must compare our data in order to track our progress and be accountable.

Recognizing that language evolves, Creative BC will review social identity terms annually. The self-identification information you provide may be used in one or more of the following ways:

1. To support Creative BC's commitment to equity, diversity, and inclusion through a better understanding of its reach and applicant base.
2. To support aggregate statistics on representation and participation across our programs and services.
3. To support the granting evaluation process should insight to specific criteria be required or supportive to the application. For details, please consult Program Guidelines for the program to which you are applying.

If you prefer not to provide self-identification information, please complete the form by selecting the "Prefer not to respond" option available for each question. All information is collected, stored and used in compliance with the Privacy Act, BC's Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act (FIPPA), and Creative BC's Privacy Policy. For more on data collection practices and purpose at Creative BC, please visit our website.
